

COLORADO COLLEGE, FINE ARTS CENTER ALLIANCE REDEFINES ARTS IN COLORADO SPRINGS

For artist and staff bring together

COLORADO SPRINGS, Colorado Aug. 25, 2016

The Colorado Springs Fine Arts Center is a cultural gem, and I'm excited about the alliance presents for all involved, Tiefenthaler said. I look forward to rolling out the most innovative, dynamic and vibrant organization possible. I plan to actively we envision the amazing future potential of the Colorado Springs Fine Arts

I'm thrilled to help create a strong and vibrant future of Fine Arts Center through upon its legacy for another 100 years, Dahlin said. This is truly a win-win agreement and the entire community.

Colorado Springs Mayor John Suthers praised the alliance. This partnership, with most prominent institutions in arts and higher education, is something we seek innovative, collaborative future building, he said. We all benefit as a community from possibilities this represents in our arts, culture and education sectors.

For nearly 100 years, the two institutions have collaborated in a variety of ways, serving as the college's de facto department in the 1920s and 1940s, cohosting an art gallery in the 1930s, collaborating on shared programming and exhibitions throughout the FAC's extensive art publication archives to the library at Colorado College.

The goal of the alliance goes beyond merging two existing organizations: It's about breaking and forward-looking, leaders of both institutions say. The partnership is a that ac8ic 0 Tw 10.4 0 Td15 Tw33 Td1(0.0T Tww 0.003 Jx)-4.7 (D22.7 (i)1

Philanthropic leaders in the Colorado Springs community have pledged their support to the Fine Arts Center partnership. Over the last couple of years, the Fine Arts Center has generated such great programming and great enthusiasm. Yet without public funding, there has been a concern about its sustainability, said FAC supporter Margot Lane.
